

CONTRIBUTORS

MATTHEW NORTON is assistant professor of sociology at the University of Oregon. His research focus is on cultural aspects of state formation.

ADAM D. REICH is a Robert Wood Johnson Health and Society Scholar and assistant professor of Sociology at Columbia University. He is the author of Selling Our Souls: The Commodification of Hospital Care in the United States, forthcoming from Princeton University Press.

DALHIA MANI is assistant professor in HEC Paris, France. She received her Ph.D. in sociology from the University of Minnesota, and has won several awards and fellowships for her dissertation research, including a National Science Foundation research grant. Her research interests lie at the intersection of networks, social structure, and organizations. Her current projects include tracking economy-wide corporate networks over time and assessing consequences for organizational behavior and outcomes.

JAMES MOODY is the Robert O. Keohane Professor of Sociology at Duke University. He has published extensively in the field of social networks, methods, and social theory. His work has focused theoretically on the network foundations of social cohesion and diffusion, with a particular emphasis on building tools and methods for understanding dynamic social networks. He has used network models to help understand school racial segregation, adolescent health, disease spread, economic development, and the development of scientific disciplines. He is winner of INSNA's (International Network for Social Network Analysis) Freeman Award for scholarly contributions to network analysis, founding director of the Duke Network Analysis Center, and editor of the on-line Journal of Social Structure.

STEFAN WALGRAVE is a professor of political science at the University of Antwerp (Belgium). His works deals with social movements and protest, elections, media and politics, and with the information-processing of political elites.

RUUD WOUTERS is a postdoctoral researcher in the department of Political Science at the University of Antwerp. He is a member of the research group Media, Movements and Politics (MDEFINEP). His research interests center on mass media, social movements, and protest participation.

MELISSA J. WILDE is associate professor of sociology at the University of Pennsylvania. Her research focuses on religious change, including the cultural and institutional factors behind Vatican II; the demographic factors that explain why American Protestantism has gone from being majority mainline to majority conservative (with Mike Hout and Andrew Greeley); the cultural and competition-related factors that led to the Catholic Church's increase in marital annulments; and, currently, how race and class intersected with American religious groups to explain their views of birth control circa 1931.

SABRINA DANIELSEN is a Ph.D. candidate in sociology at the University of Pennsylvania. Her research seeks to understand how religious institutions deal with contentious social issues over time. Her dissertation explores mainline Protestants and abortion since the 1960s and other recent work has focused on evangelical Protestants and environmental issues since the 1980s.