

CONTRIBUTORS

PATRICK SHARKEY is associate professor of sociology at New York University, with an affiliation at NYU's Robert F. Wagner School for Public Service. His first book was published in 2013 by the University of Chicago Press and is titled Stuck in Place: Urban Neighborhoods and the End of Progress toward Racial Equality.

JENNIE E. BRAND is associate professor of sociology at the University of California, Los Angeles, and associate director of the California Center for Population Research (CCPR). Her research centers on inequality and its implications for various outcomes that indicate life chances. This substantive focus accompanies a methodological focus on causal inference and the application and innovation of statistical models for panel data. Current research projects include evaluation of heterogeneity in the effects of education on socioeconomic outcomes and the socioeconomic and social-psychological consequences of job displacement.

JULI SIMON THOMAS is a Ph.D. candidate at the University of California, Los Angeles, and a student affiliate at the CCPR. Her research centers on social stratification and mobility. She is particularly interested in the choices people make at transitional times in the life course, what disruptions in the life course mean to these transitional times, and the roles that education and income inequality play. Methodologically, she focuses on causal inference.

JENNIFER GLASS is the Barbara Bush Professor of Liberal Arts in the Department of Sociology and research associate in the Population Research Center at the University of Texas, Austin. She has published over 50 articles and books on work and family issues, gender stratification in the labor force, mother's employment and mental health, and religious conservatism and women's economic attainment, with funding from the National Science Foundation, the National Institutes of Health, and the Alfred P. Sloan Foundation.

PHILIP LEVCHAK is currently a visiting assistant professor at the University of Iowa. He conducts research in the areas of religion, globalization, comparative homicide, and incarceration.

MICHAEL T. HEANEY is assistant professor of organizational studies and political science at the University of Michigan. His research focuses on the organizational politics of social movements, interest groups, and political parties, with a particular emphasis on how they are connected through social networks. His forthcoming book with Fabio Rojas is titled Party in the Street: The Antiwar Movement and the Democratic Party after 9/11.

FABIO ROJAS is associate professor of sociology at Indiana University, Bloomington. His research focuses on organizational behavior, political sociology, education, and formal models. He is the author of From Black Power to Black Studies: How a Radical Social Movement Became an Academic Discipline (Johns Hopkins University Press 2007).

JUSTIN PETER STEIL is a Ph.D. candidate at Columbia University. His research focuses on urban inequality, immigration and citizenship, and the exercise of power through control over space. His recent publications include Searching for the Just City Debates in Urban Theory and Practice (Routledge 2010, with Marcuse et al.).

ION BOGDAN VASI is assistant professor in the Department of Sociology at the University of Iowa. His research examines how social movements contribute to organizational change, industry creation, and policy making. He is also interested in the role of hobbyists and activists for the adoption of clean technologies.